The Civil War Prison Camp at Point Lookout, MD
July 1863 - August 1865

Point Lookout Prison Camp in Maryland was a massive Civil War prison (1863-1865) on the Chesapeake Bay constructed in the wake of the Battle of Gettysburg with the need for immediate housing for many of the captured Confederate prisoners. It held a significant role in the prisoner of war system throughout its existence, as well as the aftermath of the Civil War.

Bob Crickenberger has spent over 30 years researching the Point Lookout Prison. He presents a clearer picture of what happened at this prison camp to both guards and prisoners, as well as presents newly uncovered information.

First Ladies of the Civil War

Presented By The American Civil War Museum

<https://www.eventbrite.com/e/first-ladies-of-the-civil-war-tickets-669019173357>

As First Ladies, Mary Todd Lincoln and Varina Banks Howell Davis experienced 19th-century political life at the highest levels. In some ways they were quite similar — southern, well-educated, and gifted conversationalists. They both had their fair share of critics during their husbands' time in office, and neither woman was one to sit back quietly. In addition to handling the duties that came with being the president's wife, they were mothers of young children during a time when disease took a deadly toll on families, hence they were forced to deal with both stress and grief. Each survived her husband and sought to preserve his memory. However, only one of the two women triumphed over her circumstances, the other became a victim.

In this course, you'll learn from Kelly Hancock, director of programs for the American Civil War Museum. As a public historian focused on the American Civil War for almost 25 years, Kelly Hancock researches the lives of individuals and explores how their stories intersect with history. She uses historic writings, documents, objects, and photographs (some of which are in the American Civil War Museum's own collection) to enhance presentations and aid people of today in seeing the past as the past saw itself.
